

Wanting to be better than everyone else:

In order to elaborate each reason I have to concentrate my focus completely onto the writing as well as self reflection. So this is definitely not an easy task but I will write my best.

The reason I want to be better than others in and of itself is a weakness.

Because in my subconscious I tend to think that being better will make people respect me and that feed my ego. The major weakness of all is that as long as I base my personal value on outside sources, I will never be stable.

The core of my being will be shaken as soon as I don't get validation from people. Even finding out this dark desire and writing them out make me cringed.

There is nothing wrong in feeling proud when people respect you because it is natural and everybody does. The problem is when you start chasing people's respect. The moment you have this attitude, everyone knows it. Not only people repulse this self-important desire but also not healthy for yourself.

There are always someone who is smarter than me in a different way, so what? Everyone's situation is different so there's no need to compare yourself with others.

The antidote to this syndrome is to set yourself high-standard and make sure you understand it crystal clear. Of course, they have to be attainable and reasonable. And then compare yourself only with your own standard. When you're going through difficult time, have faith in your ability and align your way with that standard. If you can do that, you will no longer want to be better than anyone else but yourself.