

Thinking that everyone is better than me.

This is also another illusion, no one is competing with me and I am not competing with anyone either. The reason why have this thinking is because you saw different people who have the characteristics that you are also trying. For example, recently I saw a group of young people who live in America and they all speak English beautifully. It is true that they are better speakers than me but it doesn't even stop me from improving. Instead you should be looking at them as an evidence of what people like me can do.

What you are seeing on social media is only a facade of their life, they may have something you don't and vice versa. You should be happy because their results show that you can also achieve the type of mastery you desire. Comparing yourself to others without understanding how they've achieved is just an arbitrary. The reason you have this thinking depicts that you haven't done enough work yet and you are wishing things to be easy. In reality, it's like an earthworm being exposed to salt shocked uncontrollably.

Therefore, heed your future self advice. You don't have to be worried about how other people doing better than you and certainly should not beat yourself up because of your current level. " Having a high standard for your education is very important, set yourself a level you want to reach and never stop working until you reach." In this case I know you want to be speak like a native speaker and I have total faith that you can do it. Instead of seeking perfection work on tiny improvement everyday and I promise you will be amazed by what you can accomplish in three years.
